A Spicy Secondary Packaging Solution

A leading specialty food company wanted to improve marketing its line of dry chili kits. The kits were being packaged into overwrapped trays and flat-bottom paper pouches, which were both costly to assemble and difficult to display effectively. The company wanted to reduce its costs and ensure a more consistent product display, while retaining its unique brand identification.

Building on Experience

Cloud, was already managing the packaging of the individual chili seasoning pouches before sending them to a third party for final assembly. By working with the customer and combining its product familiarity with its secondary packaging expertise, an alternative packaging solution was developed. The customer converted all finished products to a chipboard display carton capable of standing up on shelves and in end-of-aisle displays.

Streamlining Production

The Cloud secondary packaging team first located a used ADCO Vertical Cartoner capable of erecting, filling and gluing the carton shut. Once purchased, Cloud customized the equipment to suit the application. Engineers resized and retooled the cartoner and fabricated a tilt-tray bucket infeed. In addition, Cloud worked closely with the customer to develop the carton's specifications. In less than four months, the packaging line was up and running.

One-Stop Shop

Today, Cloud does both the primary and secondary packaging for the customer. Packaging costs are down, with more efficient assembly. Cloud was able to reduce the supply chain, by providing the client with the finished case, eliminating the need to manage another supplier and reducing overall costs. And finally, the new finished carton's consistent display opened up new marketing possibilities, while preserving the company's brand identity.
